

Article title: Coordination in Nkami

The paper titled above is a good and well researched article on a less studied language.

The paper has an explicit goal which the author adequately addressed. The author's account of issues raised in the paper are very comprehensive and well laid out.

The methodology adopted is well suited.

However, there are few minor issues the author needs to consider before the paper gets published:

- i. The status of Nkami as an endangered language is arguable and not supported by enough evidence in the paper. It is not clear why classify the language as endangered when it even has an active language community in Benin for instance. A follow up with data from the Ghana Statistical Service will be of great importance. It is evidently clear the language can best be described as a less researched language instead of 'an endangered language'.
- ii. Glossing for 'maasu' in the last paragraph of page 6 is missing.

In all, I recommend the paper for publication after these minor revisions.
